

Living in Between: Diversity Education through Storytelling

A project of the Tasmanian Centre for Global Learning in partnership with
Hobart College Students Against Racism and
The Alcorso Foundation
Funded by the Tasmanian Community Fund and the Sidney Myer Fund

Students Against Racism is a group of students who came to Australia as refugees and migrants from a diversity of countries and personal circumstances.

Working with their teacher, Gini Ennals, at Hobart College, they developed a dramatic presentation that explains why they left their homelands, the journey that brought them to Australia and their lives now.

Their aim in developing the presentation was to be proactive in the face of the racism they encountered, which they felt came from a lack of understanding about why asylum seekers, refugees and migrants were settling in Tasmania.

'Living in Between' has since been developed into a workshop for school groups that involves performance and activities. The workshop gets students out of their chairs and engaging with issues around culture, diversity and why people settle in Australia.

In 2011, 'Living in Between' will be available to school groups in the Kingborough and Huon areas. The group will work with schools to deliver a program that will include professional development for teachers, workshops with students and classroom activity resources that will encourage all participants to build new relationships and learn more about other cultures and countries.
